

Gold

Technical

Gold markets fell significantly during the week, reaching down towards the $1200 level, an area that has been support more than once. By forming a hammer, it looks as if it is ready to turn around and try to rally a bit, perhaps reaching towards the $1250 level, and maybe even back towards the highs over the longer-term. However, pay attention to the US dollar and what it is doing. If it starts to fall in value, then the gold could turn things around as it offers plenty of value. If it do break down below the $1200 level, it would not surprise me at all to see this market goes looking towards the $1120 level, and then perhaps the $1000 level after that. That is an area where it would buy as much gold as a possibly could, because it should be such a longer-term buying opportunity based upon a break out years ago. It suspect that if there is a time where buyers should return, this is probably it.

Highlights

- Gold prices held onto the last session's gains early today, extending a rally from a 17-month low
- The metal had also hit its lowest since March 2017 at $1,204 an ounce in the previous session
- The more expensive dollar is capping the rally in gold prices
- Downside for gold still appears to be possible especially if the dollar continues to rally
- The dollar had also weakened against the yuan on Friday after the Chinese central bank sought to stabilize its currency

Fundamentals

- Gold prices inched higher today, extending their recovery from a 17-month low, amid lingering worries over the US-China trade conflict, while a stronger US dollar capped the safe haven's gains.
- Spot gold was up 0.2 per cent at $1,215.71 an ounce, building on its 0.5 per cent gain on Friday. Spot gold may retest a support at $1,206 per ounce, a break below which could cause a loss to the next support at $1,194. US gold futures were little changed at $1,223.7 an ounce.
- Gold is still very much being influenced by how the dollar is moving. The uptick in gold prices is from the market pricing in how the US-China trade war issues actually play out.
- Gold prices rebounded on Friday from a 17-month low of $1,204 per ounce as dollar slipped after data showed US job growth slowed in July. Hedge funds and money managers added a hefty 13,931 contracts to their net short position, bringing it to 41,087 contracts, the biggest since records became publicly available in 2006.
- The dollar also weakened against the yuan on Friday after the Chinese central bank sought to stabilize its currency. The greenback, however, regained footing today and strengthened against major peers.
- China proposed retaliatory tariffs on $60 billion worth of US goods on Friday, further escalating a bitter trade conflict, after the Trump administration sought to ratchet up pressure for trade concessions by proposing a higher 25-per cent tariff on $200 billion worth of Chinese imports.
- While the intensifying trade spat has been one of the reason gold prices have been supported above the $1,200 handle, the trade issues have also been playing off into a more expensive dollar rather than higher gold prices.

Crude Oil

Technical

The WTI Crude Oil market went back and forth during the week, trying to break above the $70 handle but failing. We also found plenty of support near the $67 level, so it's likely that it will continue to see volatility. It's going to be difficult to trade this market from the longer-term, as it is essentially stuck in a range between the $67 level and the bottom and the $70 level on the top. If it can break above $71, then the market probably goes to the $74 level above. If it break down below the uptrend line underneath, then the market should break down significantly. Brent markets were a little bit more negative than the WTI market, as it has touched the uptrend line. The $72 level offering support, making a nice opportunity for buying if it can stay above there on a pullback. However, if we can break above the $76 level, that's also a buying opportunity as it should then go looking towards $79.

Highlights

- Crude futures pulled back, giving up gains from the previous session as investors concerns weighed on the market
- Hedge funds and other money managers cut their bullish U.S crude bets in the latest week
- Russian oil output rose by 150,000 barrels per day (bpd) in July from a month earlier to 11.21 million bpd
- Output by top exporter Saudi Arabia has also risen recently, to around 11 million bpd
- U.S drillers cut rigs for the second week in three, reducing the number of oil rigs by two to 859

Fundamentals

- Oil rose today after Saudi crude production registered an unexpected decline in July and U.S drilling appeared to slow, although the price is still almost 10 percent below its 2018 high of more than $80 a barrel.
- Markets also anticipated an announcement from Washington on renewed U.S sanctions against major oil exporter Iran. So-called "snapback" sanctions are due to be reinstated, according to a U.S Treasury official.
- Saudi Arabia pumped around 10.29 million barrels per day (bpd) of crude in July, two OPEC sources said on Friday, down about 200,000 bpd from a month earlier.
- That drop came despite a pledge by the Saudis and top producer Russia in June to raise output from July, with Saudi Arabia pledging a "measurable" supply boost.
- Brent crude oil futures were up 31 cents on the day at $73.52 a barrel, while U.S futures rose 35 cents to $68.84 barrel. Saudi Arabia last week cut its official selling prices for Asian customers to a four-month low.
- Saudi Arabia knows that the U.S really does want to see maximum impact from sanctions towards Iran, which means that they want to prepare all buyers of Iranian crude to say 'there is plenty of oil in the market and don't be afraid to pull back on Iran purchases.
- This is not about bombarding the market with oil and pushing the price into the $50's, it is about preparing the market and easing the transition. Most Iranian crude exports go to China and India, but roughly 20 percent go to Europe, where refiners have already cut their purchases.

Silver

Technical

Silver markets were very noisy during the trading week, breaking down below the $15.50 level at one point. It turned around to form a bit of a hammer, and for the third week in a row it has seen buyers underneath willing to pick this market up. Economists think that this market certainly has plenty of support underneath, and therefore a buyer from the longer-term perspective. However, it also recognize that it's difficult to be a buyer of this market with a lot of leverage. Because of this, it's only a matter time before the value hunters return on these dips, and they are building larger positions, perhaps reaching towards the $16.50 level. If it can break above there, the next target of course is the $17.50 level, which is massive resistance. if it can get above that level, the market could be looking at $18.50.

Highlights

- Silver rose 0.5 per cent to $15.45 an ounce after posting an eighth weekly decline last week
- Expectations for higher rates tend to be bearish for silver
- A stronger U.S currency makes silver and other dollar-denominated commodities more expensive for foreign investors
- Investors have also shunned the precious metal despite an escalation in global trade tensions, indicating that silver may be losing its safe haven status
- U.S interest rate hikes this year underpin demand for the greenback

Fundamentals

- Silver prices traded flat in Asia within striking distance of July 19 lows, while the dollar index eked out gains for the fourth session out of five, amid a lack of data from the US today. Business activity in the euro zone lost some momentum at the start of the third quarter.
- Silver futures due in September rose 0.02% to $15.46 an ounce, while the dollar index added 0.15% to 95.30 from the opening of 95.16. U.S job growth slowed more than expected in July as employment in the transportation and utilities sectors fell, but a drop in the unemployment rate suggested that labor market conditions continued to tighten.
- Last Friday saw the release of the US payrolls report, which showed the unemployment rate fell to 3.9% as expected from 4.0% in June, while average hourly earnings rose 0.3% as expected, up from 0.1% in June.
- The economy added 157 thousand jobs last month, down from 248 thousand in June, and missing estimates of 191K, as the trade deficit rose to $46.3 billion from $43.2 billion in May, below estimates of $46.5 billion.
- The US ISM services PMI fell to 55.7 in July from 59.1 in June, missing estimates of 58.6, while the trade deficit widened to $46.3 billion in June from $43.2 billion in May, below estimates of $46.5 billion.
- The mostly disappointing US data released last week blunted some of the momentum behind two Federal Reserve rate hikes this year, with bets leaning towards just one hike in September.
- Last week, the Federal Open Market Committee voted to hold overnight interest rates unchanged at 1.75% to 2.0% as expected by analysts, while laying the groundwork for further policy tightening and normalization of the balance sheet in the months to come.
